This time I was rushed into car No. 3,058, in the apex of a scrimmage. As before men occupied nearly all the seats and women dangled and swayed from straps that wrenched their wrists and bit into the tender flesh of their fingers. In this car, with a scating capacity of sixty, only eight women had found or been given seats. There were three women standing to every man not peaked. I quitted it at Fourteenth street.

Another train took me to the bridge again, and and and and such other remotion was about until I saw the article in the World later.
